party. They had discovered that some of the robins had already moved near their favorite home. Of course, you know, the fairies have a great many homes."

"It was this afternoon that they had the party, you said, daddy?" repeated Evelyn.

"Yes," said daddy; "I think if you see them to-morrow you'll find them really singing with much more joy."

"What happened at the party?" asked Jack.

"I'll tell you," said daddy. "The robins were invited to be at the party at 3 o'clock. They spent the whole morning getting ready. They smoothed their feathers before a little brook where the sun was shining. It made a fine mirror, and they fussed until they really did look very fine. When they arrived at the place where the fairies had told them to be they saw not a sign of a fairy.

"The place was very beautiful. All around were lovely little white statues. They looked so pretty on the new, soft, green moss. But the robins thought how very funny it was to have everything ready and no fairies in sight, for they were sure the statues were put there by the fairies to make the party especially at-
